Investment Comments

The first Budget Speech by Finance Minister Nene was in general well received across the board by local commentators. In a recent Business Day editorial, the point is made that although the speech was comprehensive it tended to tiptoe around politically sensitive issues. Mr Nene referred to the “sales of nonstrategic state assets” to fund power utility Eskom’s considerable capital expenditure requirements. The editorial suggests that there are a number of reasons for this brief reference to the sale of assets. The first is that where the issue is very politically sensitive and is thus a subject best avoided, that issue could intentionally be buried deep inside a technical document such as the budget review. The dreaded “P-word” is one of them. That is why what everyone secretly understands to be a form of privatisation – albeit an involuntary one – is referred to by such a longwinded euphemism.

While the budget speech did contain a lot of positives, the Fitch ratings agency has already fired a warning shot. Fitch’s attitude is in contrast to what analysts were hoping was a budget that had done enough for the country to ward off a downgrade. Fitch said that it was concerned that Nene did not flesh out enough detail in his budget speech to be convincing on the level of debt-to-GDP ratio, the outlook for public finances, the downward revision of economic growth and the strategy to help Eskom not only keep the lights on but help spur economic growth. “The outlook for the public finances will form an important part of Fitch’s next scheduled review of South Africa’s sovereign rating on 5 June,” Fitch said in a statement.

While the government and the ANC remain at odds with each other, placing huge demands on the need to keep fiscal policy tight and independent, investment markets seem to have no end in sight. The threat of deflation in the Eurozone, and the inability of the Americans and the Japanese to inject meaningful inflation into their economies, is providing on-going support for risky assets. In February, the FTSE/JSE All Share Index returned 4.1%, with Resources returning 8.7%, and Financials and Industrials returning 3.4% and 3.2%, respectively.
