Investment Comments

On 22 January Mario Draghi, President of the European Central Bank (ECB), made the long-awaited announcement that the Bank would be implementing its own Quantitative Easing (QE) program, following in the wake of a similar strategy that ended in the USA in October 2014. The US QE program was in operation for 6 years and this program has recently been credited with the salvation of the US economy which moved into recession following the market crisis in 2008/2009. This program in the US was terminated once the Federal Reserve was convinced that targets for inflation and employment were back on track. In total, the Federal Reserve had added $4.5 trillion of assets to its holdings, increasing their assets eightfold over the course of the QE strategy.

The fall in oil and commodity prices and the launch of QE in Europe has resulted in a quick reversal of interest rate expectations here in SA. Heading into the second half of 2014 (when oil was still at $115/barrel), there was a strong expectation that interest rates would have to rise early in 2015 as inflation was expected to settle stubbornly above the top of the 3% to 6% range. Now inflation expectations are being rapidly scaled back and the South African Reserve Bank (SARB) expects inflation to average 3.8% this year, down from forecasts late last year of 5.3%. The SARB expects inflation to reach a low of 3.5% in the second quarter.

The start of 2015 has been very different when compared with market expectations in the final quarter of last year. The approach and launch of Eurozone QE has reshaped our local investment landscape from an environment where interest rates were expected to go up to an environment where interest rates may go down. In December our equity market fell by -0.2% and in January it went up by 3.1%. In December the All Bond Index fell by -1.6% and in January it went up by 6.5%. In January our listed property market went up by 7.4%, adding to a 1.1% rise in December last year. Local multi-asset balanced portfolios also produced good returns in January.
